You don't need to be an expert to help others join the climate conversation.

It's important to let people know scientific experts agree about the reality of the climate crisis.

This frees you up to start with recent news or what you're feeling and thinking.

Most Americans know climate change is real and are eager to hear from you.

According to a 2020 study, 66% of us are worried about global warming, but only 5% of us discuss it regularly.

You can help break the climate silence and build a sense of community as climate anxiety and understanding of the need for climate justice grow.

IT'S REAL

EXPERTS AGREE

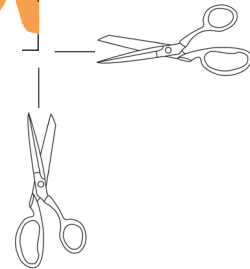

Covid showed me how critical it is to listen to the scientific experts.

Start by listing three people you could talk to about climate change.

Fold like this:

Fits in your wallet or pocket!

Climate change is human-caused, but there's no reason for guilt.

IT'S US

The source of the crisis is the fossil fuel economy. We're taught to feel guilty about individual consumer choices. That lets the fossil fuel industry off the hook.

We'll move forward by holding the right people accountable and adopting policies that prioritize climate progress and social justice.

One of the things we need to change as a society is...

Climate change already seriously impacts our lives.

IT'S BAD

Extreme weather causes severe human suffering and economic losses. Doctors say the climate crisis is a public health emergency. And climate change is an inequality multiplier.

It's easy to feel overwhelmed. Remember you're not alone in fighting for a better future. Keep that future in your mind's eye.

What would climate justice look like to you?

It's not too late to implement effective climate solutions.

Even if they're already climate-aware, people you know will appreciate ideas for action.

NOW'S THE TIME

Focus on outward-facing civic solutions, such as climate-forward voting and advocacy, joining a climate organization, and spreading the word.
